Excerpt: . has furnished us, and which are but too frequently allowed to lie dormant, and consequently remain incapable of contributing their intended share towards the establishment and maintenance of our general health, and to the performance of the tasks allotted to them with ease and dexterity. The force of the truth of W187!-S sana in cm-pore mno had its due weight with the ancients, with whom it was a subject of eat national im rtance. The education of the Grecian youth wou d have been consiggred by them very defective without this important feature. The result was, that, in that country, the finest, the healthiest, and the most vi orbus forms of the human frame were displayed. In contemplating t ese forms which have been transmitted to us through those noble productions of statuary which the modems have hitherto failed to equal, we must...
