The Jewish agricultural school must train farm helpers, who may, after several years of work for others, become independent farmers. The task of such school, therefore, is to train the young men for the rank and file, and not for leadership. No Jewish community can afford to equip and maintain a school which will equal even the poorest equipped state Institution, and in such we cannot train leaders. With less sacrifice, if leaders are needed, individual communities can educate them in the higher agricultural educational institutions, like Cornell University in the East, and the Michigan Agricultural College In the West It might be suggested that the orphan asylums should Introduce agriculture for their wards, not with any practical...
